As that of the united hosts of Medes and Persians, who were providentially instrumental in the destruction of the mighty power of Babylon, and the deliverance of the Jews, the favoured depositaries of divine knowledge during the general apostasy of the world from God, - who, in the noon-day splendour of their reign, ruled over the larger portion of the Greater and Lesser Asia - who attempted to crush the infant liberties of Europe in the Grecian States, - who carried their victorious arms to the north of Africa, and usurped for a season the rule of the Pharaohs in the land of Egypt, - who, after having for centuries succumbed to Macedonian and Parthian rule, recovered their freedom, and first set limits to the Roman Empire in the East, - who long formed a barrier to the irruption of the barbarous hordes of Scythians and Huns and Turks, by whom the civilized world was ultimately inundated, - and whose signal achievements and failures, from the very dawn of profane authentic record, have so much employed the pen of the historian, it is not without high interest in the history of the speculations and errors of the human mind.
